

for the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, Mathias Middelberg, told the dpa news agency.

Middelberg pointed out that the proportion of Syrians receiving state benefits remained high in spite of their relatively good chances of being granted protection in Germany. In other words, he suggested, having secure status does not lead to better integration into the labor market.

More should be done to help "those already living here who are entitled to protection ... especially in the area of labor market integration, ... instead of providing incentives for low-skilled and unskilled immigration, like the Greens want," Middelberg added.

Many in low-pay jobs

One reason for the relatively high proportion of Syrians receiving benefits, according to a study done by the Employment Agency last year, is that refugees often lack documents with formal qualifications and are employed in areas with "pay in the lower pay range." According to the agency, a quarter of Syrian refugees had attended universities or vocational training institutions, and 16% had a degree. Among Syrians who were born in Germany, however, four-fifths had vocational or academic degrees.

"In general, we see that the unemployment rate among refugees is always particularly high in the first years of residence," said Panu Poutvaara, a member of the German Expert Council on Integration and Migration.

For most Syrians who arrived in Germany as children, returning to Syria to live is out of the question | Photo : Picture-alliance/dpa/S.Willnow

Syrians top the list of nationalities of new arrivals in Germany since 2015. Compared with other nationalities, a large proportion (about 40%) have been women. Poutvaara, who heads the ifo Center for Migration Research, says this could also play a role in the relatively high unemployment rate. She says many Syrian women are not able to join the labor market because they have to look after small children, adding that cultural reasons may also play a role.

Also read: German study finds gender gap in refugee employment chances

In Germany, as elsewhere, the COVID-19 outbreak led to fewer employment opportunities, making integration into the labor market even harder for migrants and refugees, including Syrians. Even those migrants who were employed tended to be worse affected by the pandemic than the general population, as very few have jobs which allow them to work from home. However, Poutvaara told dpa, she remains convinced that the positive trend in labor market integration will persist, and the proportion of Syrian refugees receiving state benefits will continue to decline in the coming years.

With dpa

MORE ARTICLES

- ≥ Germany's slow bureaucracy impedes hiring of migrant workers
- ≥ Italian labor minister: Integration processes necessary to fill labor shortage
- ≥ Finding the positive: Migrants working to make 2020 a success \(Part I\)
- ≥ Audio report: Integrating migrants into Germany's workforce